Teenagers' eating habits is a vital problem as what people mostly eat while they are young determines their future health and body condition. As a part of a weekly column "Get to know teenagers better," I have conducted a survey on eating habits of teenagers. I've asked all teenagers in my town. I've launched an Internet survey to get more precise results as well.

Compared to

~~In comparison with~~ 2010, the general tendency is really satisfying. Teenagers' eating habits have become much healthier. Less young people eat hamburgers this year. I think that's due to a global trend of reducing a number of consumed calories as many people want to be fit and attractive and fattening hamburgers will certainly not make you a fitness model. The number of teenagers who eat pizza regularly has slightly decreased. It's a positive trend, but to be honest, I'd like to say not every pizza is fattening and bad for digestion. I'd just highly recommend not to order it in a fast-food restaurant. To return to the main topic of the report, there's an insignificant trend of more young people eating hot dogs regularly. I ~~think~~ believe, that's because teenagers are busier now and hot dogs are quickly made. Much more teenagers tend to eat sandwiches quite often this year. However, it's not as sad as you might think. Sandwiches can be both harmful and ~~good~~ healthy. A sandwich made of herbs, vegetables, fresh meat and low-calory bread is extremely healthy and nutritious. Most of those people, who ~~took~~ took part in my survey noted that they preferred this type of sandwich.

I'm happy to conclude, that negative trends are insignificant while positive trends are perceptible. I hope, that in future even more people will give up bad eating habits to make themselves fit and healthy.
