DIY Language Learning Adventures

Some people associate learning languages with completing dull tasks or revising endless lists of words. If you're one of them I'll definitely persuade you that learning ~~foreign~~ languages can have more common features with an extreme sport rather than boring academic studies.

Modelling in China

One of my favourite language learning experiences was travelling to China to work as a model there. I had been learning Chinese for six months by that moment so I was sure I would cope with living abroad for a month. However, my illusions were ruined when I realized that I couldn't understand anyone as their speech seemed a chaotic mumbling to me. ~~It was~~ Although the first days were a sheer disaster, I successfully adapted to the harsh conditions. By the end of the trip I could maintain a simple conversation and had a significant progress in pronunciation which used to be my weak point.

Chatting with my Spanish friend?

I met Marco in an online game and we immediately made friends. We communicate via Skype and messengers. Initially we spoke English but being a linguist who <sup>had given</sup> up learning Spanish <sup>a few</sup> years <sup>before</sup>, I asked him to help me with continuing my studies. Although Marco is not a qualified teacher he does his best ~~in~~ correcting my mistakes and making me sound like a native speaker. After ~~a sequence of~~ weekly videocalls, I feel that I'm much more fluent in Spanish than I used to be. Chatting with a native speaker is especially useful in terms of learning new words and slang phrases.
