As companies seek for a way to improve their performance, a newly introduced approach comes out to shine. Employers all over the world experiment with the four-day ~~week~~ workweek.

Practice shows some promising tendencies: businesses report an increase in productivity despite the shortened deadlines. Workers attend to their duties with lifted spirits and stronger motivation, which clearly indicates the benefit of an extra day off. Employees have more time to restore their energy and to monitor their physical and mental health. Implementing a four-day workweek proved to be a good course of action to bring more life into the workers' mundane routine, which results in an overall better output.

Nevertheless,

Although, despite the positive feedback, reducing working days is arguably the best and universal solution for everybody. While having longer weekends had a healing effect on a lot of people who experienced it, some claim to feel discomfort and have to endure higher levels of stress due to completely restructured schedule. Not only that, but a decent number of people points out that some jobs require five days of attendance. Some fields would simply not be able to function correctly, and not having the whole company transfer to the new system would actually make the issue worse communication-wise, so employers need to be exclusively attentive to these nuances.

To sum up, the four-day ~~week~~ ~~work day~~ workweek is an innovative approach for companies to consider, although it requires a thoughtful analysis for it to work as intended.

If Social Media Didn't Exist

$K1 = 14$
 $K2 = 8$
 $K3 = 2$
 $K4 = 4$
 $TB4 = 28$

It is pointless to deny the impact social media has on our lives. The majority of people can hardly imagine their day without scrolling through their "for-you" page. But what if social media did not exist as a concept? How many parts of our routines would change?

- Dirt-cheap happiness

Everybody knows that sunny pictures or short videos are one of the easiest ways to have a laugh and bring your mind off your problems, but not everyone likes to admit the destructive effect it has on us. Sooner or later we notice a concerning outcome of endless consumption of such media: nothing outside our phones brings us happiness anymore. The addiction to quick and effortless entertainment along with shortened attention span would do not allow us to concentrate on what we used to love. It is safe to make an assumption that our population would have reduced depression levels if "brainrotting" media did not exist.

Учебник 3

— "Old-fashioned" does not stand for "bad"!

While not having our usual ways of communicating with our colleagues might be a challenge, I believe it would have a positive impact when it comes to our friends and family. No more lazy chats with your loved ones, they only bring you an illusion of human contact anyway. Social media actually whisks away a monstrous amount of our free time. Now that it is out of the picture, you will find that going out with a company of close people is more enjoyable than online conversations. With that in mind, we can see that while technical issues will find their place in our world, the overall quality of our lives will improve!

What do you think? Would you trade social media for a possibility to experience life as it is, without digital distraction?

$$75 = 40$$

$$075 = 10 + 10 + 4,5 + 28 + 40 = 92,5 = 93$$
