Task 4

Both texts cover the concern of many successful companies, the four-day workweek. They are aimed at comparing all the pros and cons of implementing this schedule.

The first text's main idea suggests that working less can be more effective, therefore bringing in more revenue. As an explanation of such impact, it is noted that all the hours previously spent in office now can be filled with exciting activities, get-togethers or studies. However, both texts mention the potential struggles of industries in constant need of workforce in case they consider reducing working hours. Moreover, the second text brings to pay attention to other minor and major inconveniences, while questioning whether changes expected are positive or negative. It is claimed that lower efficiency and higher stress are to become more common, not the other way around. Even though both texts suggest the necessity of analysis before any changes begin in a business, I think most companies, excluding state organisations can find a way to shorten a workweek, therefore resulting in productivity increase.

Overall, two texts explore both negative and positive sides of a problem. While the first text presents more optimistic view on decreasing the time spent at work, the second one tends to be realistic, if not doubtful about this schedule. However, both texts end up making similar point of finding a balance for every individual business.

If Social Media Didn't Exist

Well, first things first, I wouldn't be writing this post right now. No social media, no accounts, no followers ~~nor viewers~~ result in no blogs. To keep it truly immersive, I've decided to break my post down into two perspectives.

Social Media Were Never Created

Under such circumstances, there would be basic things we all know: email, google and even messagers, but no place to share content with audience of any scale. I'm pretty sure I wouldn't have gone to business school because everything I learnt about marketing before ~~university~~ starting my bachelor degree had been from blogs of professionals. It would <sup>have</sup> ~~made~~ my life tougher ~~as~~ if I hadn't found my internet friend through similar blogs. On the other hand, I would spend much less time with my phone in hands or at least would read something more useful than ~~are~~ more short clip videos subtitles.

Social Media Disappeared

It would be a disaster! Even if we let our entertainments in social media apps alone, there is always a recipe we've found in Pinterest feed, a club we've seen in friend's stories and ~~ever since~~ wanted to visit, a blog that posts studentbook's pdf copies and so much more! This change would inevitably shorten the distances we could've reached online with our ideas, projects and videos. But maybe, just maybe people would find a way to grapple with a problem in question. We would see each other more often, develop our face-to-face communication skills, which is not that bad of a change.

That's how I imagine an absence of social media in our lives. What do you think is worse: if it ~~was~~ never created or if it just disappeared?
